Keywords

law, legal institutions, sources of law, the basic principles of the various fields of private and public law, European and international law

Position of the course

Law plays a key role in society. For instance, sociological evolutions may trigger the adoption of new legislation, and the outcome of political decision making processes is often concretized in legal rules. This course aims to familiarize students in the political and social sciences with a number of fundamental concepts within law, the different legal institutions, the specificity of legal reasoning, and the general principles of some main fields of law.

Contents

First, the concept of 'law' is discussed, as well as the role of law in society. Then, the sources of law and a number of fundamental concepts are reviewed. Subsequently, the political and legal institutions at international, European, federal and regional level are discussed, as well as the course of a legal procedure.

Thereinafter, the basic principles of some main fields of law are discussed, namely fundamental rights and freedoms, administrative law, personal and family law, criminal law, contract law, a number of special contracts, and social law. Particular attention is paid to recent evolutions, and to the impact of European and international law.

Initial competences

No particular prior knowledge is required; only general secondary education knowledge.

Final competences

- 1 Students must have a thorough knowledge of the basic legal concepts and terminology and must have an insight in the function of the most significant rules of law in society and in how they work.
- 2 Students will develop ready knowledge of the main aspects of the political, legal and judicial institutions in Belgium and at the European and international level, and of the principles of private and (national and international) public law.
- 3 Students must be able to fluently apply these principles to uncomplicated practical cases.
- 4 Students must acquire basic skills in recognising legal problems.
