Linguistics, evolutionary linguistics, language development - philogenetically

Position of the course
This course gives students knowledge of the problems, the methodology and the types of argumentation in evolutionary linguistics

Contents
Evolutionary linguistics was very popular around the middle of the 19th century, but ultimately proved to be too speculative. In the early nineties of the 20th century the theme was firmly set on the linguistic agenda again. Evolutionary linguistics takes advantage from all the relevant findings in anthropology, archeology, cognitive psychology, computational linguistics, neurolinguistics, etc. to set up hypotheses on the earliest stages in the development of language.

Typical issues are:
- Is human language homologous or analogous to any other communication system of related species?
- Is the complexity of human language the product of the 'classical' Darwinian processes of adaptation through natural selection, or is it a mere by-product of man's computational competences?
- Can we formulate any hypotheses on the possible/necessary features of a proto-language, and on the principles leading from this proto-language to the present variety and complexity of languages?

Initial competences
Having knowledge of the basic concepts and paradigms in linguistics, corresponding to the final competences of 'Introduction to (text) linguistics' (Ba1) and 'General Linguistics' (Ba2)

Final competences
1. Having knowledge of the argumentation in the debate on the analogous/homologous character of human language.
2. Having knowledge of the argumentation in the debate on the adaptive origin of language complexity.
3. Having knowledge of the contribution of anthropology, archeology, cognitive psychology, and other 'auxiliary' sciences to the argumentation in evolutionary linguistics.
4. Being able to reflect on possible and necessary conditions on contents and structure of any proto-language.
