Position of the course
This is an advanced course in the Master Program in History. It builds upon the methodological and practical courses in the Bachelor Program in History. Its goal is to familiarise students with the key variables and the appropriated sources and methods of the discipline of historical demography and to provide insight into the history of populations using critical comparative studies from a long-term perspective.

Contents
The course consists of two parts:

The first part consists of about six lectures, covering: (a) A critical overview of the specific sources and tools which are used in historical demographic research. (b) Practical applications which further explore the basic principles and methodology of historical demography. (c) A status questionis of recent research in this interdisciplinary field.

The second half consists of 5 seminars in which students study a given topic in groups of two to three. Research material s provided beforehand and students are expected to use the acquired knowledge from the lectures to develop a specific research design (hypotheses, sources, methods, potential pitfalls). After each seminar, each group hands in a report.

Initial competences
Students should have a good basic knowledge of socio-economic history (as acquired during the Bachelor Program in History).

Final competences
1. to be able to identify and discuss the determinants and mechanisms of developments in populations.
2. to be familiar with the most important historical-demographic sources and techniques.
3. to apply demographical theories and methods in a scientifically sound way in historical research.
4. to understand the impact of societal changes on demographic developments
