Keywords

Introduction to historical research; bibliographies and databanks; critical apparatus; academic writing.

Position of the course

This introductory course is intended to familiarize students with the basic skills necessary for independent historical research. This class interacts closely with the Practical History I courses (from among which each student must select one). The skills developed lay the groundwork for the various Practical History courses and, ultimately, the master's thesis.

Contents

- Learning how to develop a good research question
- Learning how to develop a good search strategy via the use of printed and online bibliographies, repertories and databanks
- Learning how to develop an adequate critical apparatus (footnotes, source overview, and bibliography)
- Learning about scientific communication (reading and writing)
- Becoming familiar with archives and research libraries

Initial competences

No specific prior knowledge is required. However, the students may be asked to take a preparatory exam in order to determine their own level.

Final competences

1. Be able to formulate a research question
